Many East Asian nations are about to have their Lunar New Year's parties. In China, Japan, and others, they will welcome the Year of the Rabbit. But in Vietnam, it will be the Year of the Cat. There is no clear explanation for why the Vietnamese chose the cat instead of the rabbit, but there are some good ideas.

Ngo Huong Giang, an East Asian language expert, said one reason might be that the word in Mandarin for "Year of the Rabbit" sounds similar to the Vietnamese word for cat.

Nguyen Hieu Tin, who studies Vietnamese culture, said the answer may come from the rice fields. “Rice is a huge part of life in Vietnam. But there are many rats that will eat the rice. Luckily, we have cats which can hunt them,” he says.

Poet Le Thanh Hue provides a simpler reason, “To the Vietnamese, rabbits and rats look like each other. And we don’t want two similar animals in the zodiac.” He also notes that keeping rabbits is not common in Vietnam.

Hoang Thi Huong Giang, an office worker in Hanoi, said she had never paid attention to why Vietnam celebrates a different animal than the rest of the world. But she believes that life is a breeze for those who were born in the Year of the Cat, like her. They tend to enjoy smoother paths to success and generally live more comfortable lives compared to others. “It seems to be true that those who are born in the Year of the Cat are often more active, hard-working and friendlier.” Giang added proudly.
